Dear Miss Mistral:

This week the Journal editorial staff had the very gratifying experience of being notified that our magazine was selected as the outstanding magazine of the year by Missouri's famous School of Journalism for "its brilliant contributions today toward a better realization of significant phases of the American social scene, toward international understanding and friendliness and toward intelligence in the home and the family."

Because Mr. and Mrs. Gould feel that this award to a woman's magazine is not only a tribute to our publication, but also to the influence and leadership of women in allied fields, like yourself, who have done so much to make women aware of the problems that confront the world today, they think you will be interested in knowing about it. Since the full text of the citation itself and Mrs. Gould's speech of acceptance are far more eloquent and inspiring than any words I could use to paraphrase their content, I am enclosing transcriptions of them for you to read.

This distinguished publishing award has been conferred on only three magazines, Harper's Magazine and the Atlantic Monthly having been the other two.

Sincerely,

Mary Bass
