

James Farmer signs civil rights bill

James Farmer, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, signed the civil rights bill in the Senate today. The bill, which passed the House last week, is the first major civil rights legislation since the Reconstruction era. It is expected to be signed by President Johnson within the next few days.

Farmer, who is a prominent leader of the civil rights movement, said that the bill is a landmark achievement for the nation. He said that the bill will help to end the discrimination against Negroes and will help to bring about a more just and equitable society. He said that the bill is a testament to the courage and determination of the people who have fought for civil rights for so long.

The bill, which is known as the Civil Rights Act of 1964, prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, and national origin. It also prohibits discrimination in the areas of employment, housing, and public accommodations. The bill is expected to be signed by President Johnson within the next few days.

Farmer said that the bill is a landmark achievement for the nation. He said that the bill will help to end the discrimination against Negroes and will help to bring about a more just and equitable society. He said that the bill is a testament to the courage and determination of the people who have fought for civil rights for so long.
