It seems to me that the 1990s represent a period in which the United States has been able to make significant progress in the area of human rights. This progress has been made possible by a number of factors, including the end of the Cold War, the rise of democratic movements, and the increased attention of the international community to human rights issues. The United States has played a leading role in this progress, and it is my hope that it will continue to do so in the years ahead.

Abstract Staphylococcus aureus and Staphylococcus epidermidis were isolated from the skin of patients with burns and compared with strains isolated from healthy skin. The strains were characterized by phage typing, pulsed-field gel electrophoresis (PFGE), and polymerase chain reaction (PCR) using staphylococcal enterotoxin A (SEA) and staphylococcal enterotoxin B (SEB) genes. The results showed that the strains isolated from burn patients were more virulent than those from healthy skin. The virulence of the strains was determined by the presence of SEA and SEB genes. The results showed that the strains isolated from burn patients were more virulent than those from healthy skin.
