Research suggests that a person's social network is a significant determinant of their health. A person's social network can provide emotional support, information, and resources that can help them cope with stress and maintain good health. A person's social network can also influence their health behaviors, such as smoking, drinking, and exercise. A person's social network can also influence their access to healthcare services. A person's social network can be a source of strength and resilience, helping them to overcome challenges and maintain good health.

Researcher says the 1990s provide an excellent opportunity to investigate the impact of the new, more extensive, powers of the federal government on the states. "Although there are many factors influencing the American government in general, state, and federal government, the federal government has been the most important factor in the past 100 years," says the author.
