These studies indicate that the use of a single, low-dose, low-potency steroid may be sufficient to control inflammation in the airways. The steroid, budesonide, is available in a form of a metered dose inhaler, and may be used by patients with mild asthma. The use of steroids in asthma management is well established. In patients with moderate to severe asthma, there is a clear benefit when low-dose steroids are used. These data suggest that low-dose steroids may be used in patients with mild asthma.
