Depression often occurs in association with other illnesses in the community. This population, including a few family members, suffers the same burden as the physically ill, but they are not physically ill. Indeed, they are often the most active and energetic people in their communities. The depression may be the result of the physical illness, but it may also be the result of the social isolation that occurs when the physically ill are unable to work, go to school, or go to church. These individuals are often the most vulnerable members of society, as they are often the most lonely persons.

The other condition to remember is the comorbidity of depression with other psychiatric conditions. For example, we all know that depression and anxiety often coexist, and the comorbidity of anxiety and depression is the most common. The drugs for the anxiety disorders, however, do not always work, and many are not willing to take them. These drugs are often not effective in the treatment of depression, and the depression may be the result of the anxiety. This is a common problem in the treatment of depression, and it is often necessary to treat both conditions at the same time.

Another important consideration is the depression associated with the physical illness. For example, depression following a heart attack, or depression following a stroke, or depression following a cancer diagnosis. These conditions are often associated with depression, and the depression may be the result of the physical illness. These conditions are often associated with depression, and the depression may be the result of the physical illness. These conditions are often associated with depression, and the depression may be the result of the physical illness.
