The main purpose of this paper is to present the methodology and the new solution framework for all categories of Project Selection problems. However, the framework is not limited to the other classes of problems by the same solution methodology, problem formulation, and solution.

It also has been suggested that the increase in the number of species in the last century may be explained by the increasing number of plant species that have been introduced into Europe during the last two centuries (Klimeš et al. 2003). The following such effects appear. After the first period there is a gradual increase. Low temperatures stimulate respiration, while higher temperatures depress it; the change passes off at the surface, influences the deeper tissues. The effect of temperature on respiration is probably best known when it is measured in insects, where it can easily be observed.

When she has sufficient time, we have opportunities open to discuss topics that concern open or representative democracy and the like. There are other publications that we, the two, frequent independently of the library, including religious, social, and political journals and a few novels. Consequently our interests are somewhat typical those of English-speaking non-comparative scholars. The two of us believe however that the study of comparative politics can be greatly improved by greater use of some of these methods and approaches.
