The most business friendly, all-pervasive element of the European model seems to favour the other, more traditional models in the same way as the public model. However, the latter is not without its own difficulties of managing the "protectionist" pressure exerted by the public sector on private companies, reducing their efficiency through rigid economic planning, and by some less lenient forms of state intervention.

The situation stabilizes, and managers can now evaluate just one important risk from the perspective of their own interests, the costs of action or inaction, and the potential gains resulting from various outcomes. These experts are facilitating the greater clarity of information and improving the decision-making framework so the company is better equipped to take the initiative to improve its financial status. In addition, with many companies now employing alternative, alternative risk mitigation techniques, the importance of the insurance industry as a provider of traditional insurance products is declining.

Conclusión. El dato ilustra que el punto de partida de una alta tasa de la población en edad de votar tiene una relación positiva con la proporción de votos emitidos y que existe una relación negativa entre la edad media y la tasa de votación emitida.
