Other scholars have also suggested that people's income levels and the presence of children may be important determinants of child abuse. In some cases, however, there is evidence that economic factors are not the primary determinants of child abuse. For example, one study found that child abuse rates were higher among families with lower income than among families with higher income, but the difference was not statistically significant (Kaufman et al., 1992). Another study found that child abuse rates were higher among families with higher income than among families with lower income, but the difference was not statistically significant (Kaufman et al., 1992).
