卷之三

From all we can, or know of historical sources, there is no such thing as the "Celtic language," though it is so often used as a title. There have been many attempts made to find linguistic unity among the Celts, and such attempts are usually not without some success.
There are, however, so many differences between the various dialects that it is difficult to say exactly what may be the true Celtic language.

On 2 May 1916, at approximately 10:00 AM, the author was walking near the entrance to the Canyon Creek Ranch, when he observed a large number of small birds flying about the trees and bushes. The birds were identified as various species of finches.
The author noted that the birds were feeding on the seeds of the mesquite trees.

Consequently it was necessary to go to the station to have them all sent off to the city. It was difficult to get the men to leave, as they had been engaged for so long and had no other work available.
However, the men were finally sent off by rail, and the day was over.
