The situation will be aggravated by decisions by members of state officials to remove the 16 government ministers. Under the Jonathan Biya system, approximately 90% of the members of government are appointed by the president to their ministerial posts. In the new system, as it is proposed, the public will continue to have authority over the appointment of ministers and the government — under their general heading the State Council — will not be subject to interference or control. The 16 figures are therefore distinguished from their predecessors. Ministers will therefore gain more responsibility than they had before. At this time, however, the problem is to ensure that in this, more probably, an unpredictable year no minister will become your enemy.
