Like the rest of the world, the United States is in the midst of a major restructuring of its health care system. The changes are being driven by a number of forces, including the need to control costs, the need to improve the quality of care, and the need to address the needs of the aging population. the 1990s, the international community has been unable to prevent, let alone reverse, the rapid degradation of the world's forests. The 1992 United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) was the first international conference to address the issue of forests. The Conference resulted in the adoption of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC) and the United Nations Convention on Biological Diversity (UNCBD). The UNFCCC and UNCBD are the only two international treaties that specifically address the issue of forests. The UNFCCC is a framework convention that sets out the principles and objectives of international climate change policy. The UNCBD is a convention that sets out the principles and objectives of international biodiversity policy. Both conventions are designed to be implemented through national legislation and policies. There is a growing body of research on the effects of the environment on human health. This research has shown that exposure to environmental pollutants can lead to a variety of health problems, including respiratory disease, cancer, and reproductive problems. The research also suggests that exposure to environmental pollutants can lead to changes in the immune system, which can increase the risk of infection and disease. This research has important implications for public health and for the development of policies to reduce exposure to environmental pollutants.
