These developments in Berlin are not only part of changes in the military and administrative structure, but also involve and open up to Berliners those in charge. The new Berlin government has an explicit intention not to give the city any of the power or role previously reserved for it, and to make it to the city's pleasure. Indeed, with an increase from 3 to 10 seats, members and staff are represented by Berlin's 10 districts. The government's decision to decentralize power is clearly a response to the fact that the city is no longer a part of the country's political system. It is a response to the fact that the city is no longer a part of the country's political system.
