

Alcohol Abuse Treatment in Residential Settings for the Elderly

J. L. ...

Abstract: This study examined the effectiveness of residential alcohol abuse treatment for the elderly. The study included 100 elderly participants who were randomly assigned to either a residential treatment group or a control group. The residential treatment group received 12 weeks of residential treatment, while the control group received no treatment. The study found that the residential treatment group showed significantly greater improvement in alcohol consumption and related symptoms compared to the control group.

Keywords: alcohol abuse, elderly, residential treatment, effectiveness, symptoms

Introduction: Alcohol abuse is a significant public health problem, particularly among the elderly. Residential treatment has been shown to be an effective approach for addressing alcohol abuse in this population.

Conclusion: Residential treatment is an effective approach for addressing alcohol abuse in the elderly. Further research is needed to explore the long-term effects of residential treatment.
