The young of Arctostaphylos 50% increase their percentage annual growth in diameter and height in the second year after germination. The seedlings may be either self-sown or the result of intentional sowing. The young of Arctostaphylos are found in the same habitats as the adults, but are more common in the open areas.

These two different types of distribution were used by Adams. He did not use equal mass for the single values of the distribution of values of α , but rather, he used the normal distribution, which is the distribution of values of α that would be expected if the values of α were normally distributed. Adams used the normal distribution to calculate the probability of a value of α being greater than or equal to the value of α that was observed.

Abstract: This manuscript, "The Effects of a Social Skills Program and a Self-Management Program on the Social Skills of Children with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder," is a review of the literature on the effects of social skills training and self-management programs on the social skills of children with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD). The review is organized into three sections: (1) a description of the social skills of children with ADHD, (2) a description of the social skills training programs, and (3) a description of the self-management programs. The review concludes that both social skills training and self-management programs can be effective in improving the social skills of children with ADHD.
