

Literatura y vida.

It was, for these English historians, that the problem was always this: "What are the causes of English unpopularity?" Because "the English are not English for us," the problem descended on the English to understand why the world was so unkind to them. In the past, this English suspicion, suspicion of themselves, had led them to say that they were "a people without a past." But this suspicion, suspicion of themselves, had led them to say that they were "a people without a past." But this suspicion, suspicion of themselves, had led them to say that they were "a people without a past."
